Milk, the primary source of calcuim

By SHIRLEY W. WALTON
Extension Agent

Milk is the primary source of the important nutrient, calcium. Unfortunately, not everyone can drink milk.

Some individuals suffer from discomfort because they lack the enzyme digest lactose, a natural form of sugar present in milk. It is possible that these people are deficient in the enzyme lactase.

Researchers at the University of Minnesota have found that individuals bothered by milk experience little or no discomfort eating yogurt containing active cultures. Similar amounts of lactose were added to yogurt, milk and water. The test participants who received yogurt had fewer cases of lower digestive upsets than those given the lactose dissolved in water or milk. The researchers, also, found that those eating the yogurt had absorbed more of the lactose than those drinking the milk or water solutions.

Good News For Homemakers

Yogurt is a cultured dairy product that can be made from whole, lowfat or skim milk, with added nonfat dry milk. Most plain lowfat yogurt has some dry milk solids added to give the product stability.

One cup of plain lowfat yogurt can provide 50 percent of the adult daily requirement of calcium, 35 percent of riboflavin and 21 percent of the protein.

One cup of plain lowfat yogurt has approximately 145 calories and provides approximately 415 milligrams of calcium. That is twice as much as in one ounce of cheddar cheese for only about 30 more calories.

Why don't you try yogurt? It is nutritious and comes in delicious flavors with fruit added.
